UK Outlook for Saturday 10 Jul 2021 to Monday 19 Jul 2021:
A cloudy start over the weekend with some rain likely in south and southwestern areas. This could break up into showers into next week, potentially widespread and heavy, especially across central and southern areas. Drier and warmer weather will then develop from the west with just a few light showers possible. The threat of some spells of rain and a few showers potentially crossing the northern half of the country at times remains. Towards the end of the period conditions are looking mostly fine and dry, though there remains a chance of isolated thunderstorms. Many areas are likely to see temperatures trending upwards through the period, with parts of the south potentially becoming very warm. Winds are looking to remain light across the UK for most of the period.
